Since obtaining my PhD in Poultry Science (2002), the prime focus of my research career has continued to address the various aspects of poultry science, especially nutrition, welfare, and biodiversity preservation. Since 2013 me and my research team have developed considerable amount of research related to the use of insects in poultry nutrition. I have also dedicated considerable time and energy to numerous projects carried out in developing countries and in association with the industrial sector, with the primary scope of skill transfer. My research interests and desire to interact with the scientific community in international contexts has led me to attend a multitude of congresses (worldwide) and complete several research secondments (in France and Spain). Since 2002, I have been teaching bachelor, master, and PhD courses in animal nutrition and poultry science.
